Training and Validation Datasets

While building real world machine learning models, it is quite common to split the dataset into 3 parts:

1. Training set - used to train the model i.e. compute the loss and adjust the weights of the model using gradient descent.
2. Validation set - used to evaluate the model while training, adjust hyperparameters (learning rate etc.) and pick the best version of the model.
3. Test set - used to compare different models, or different types of modeling approaches, and report the final accuracy of the model.

As you can see the Validation graph is increase in some point of training. This mean the model is overfitting and it is bad because it is specialize in this model but not as general. When we train our model we want to make sure the model is generalise as much as possible.
